

Summary

The corporate governance is one of the concepts that has been discussed and applied throughout the world in recent years. Corporate governance is the body of applications that demand the restructuring of the firms observing the principles of transparency, fairness and responsibility, and guard the interests of its members. Generally, the whole of the organizational efficiency raising practices; from the determination of the aims, goals and tactics to the organization of the team and motivation activities are based on the confidence that is believed to exist among the members of the organization. However, the lack of organizational confidence can impede the realization of the results that are expected out of the given activities. It will be much easier to raise the efficiency and the quality in a business dominated by the confidence environment. The corporate governance is a participatory, democratic and transparent perception of management that is respectful to the human rights and based on the needs of the citizens. Hence it will not be wrong to state that the corporate governance can not be perpetuated in the countries where the corruption is commonplace. With this study composed in the light of these observations, the determination of the relation between the corporate governance and the confidence, and the benefits of this relation to the firms have been explored.
